(N.B.—In interrogative sentences, the particle -nē is attached to the negative, thus: nonne: which in direct questions begins the sentence, according to rule above, in indirect ones its position being more or less a matter of euphony: did not Lentulus come to you? did not Sanga? nonne ad te Lentulus venit? non Sanga? Cic. in Pis. 31, 77: he was asked whether he did not think Archelaus son of Perdiccas happy? ex eo quiescunt (est), Archelaean Perdiccae fitium nonne beatum putaret? id, Tusc. 5, 12, init. of: I. Denoting the relation of one sub. to another: 1. expr. by gen. pass. N.B.—This constr. cannot be used (a) when the latter sub. denotes the same thing as the former (apposition: as, urbs Roma, insula Tenetos, where the gen. can never stand); nor (b) when the latter sub. denotes a quality of the former, except when an adj. is attached to the latter (hence, a man of genius, vir ingeniōs or vir magni ingeni: never vir ingenii); nor (c) when the latter sub. denotes the material of which the former is made (a statue of marble, statua marmorea, never statua marmoris); nor (d) in indicating the place of any one's birth (a man of Athens, Atheniensis; never vir Athenarum).

2. sometimes instead of gen. a prep. may be used, to define more exactly the relation between the two subss.: e. g. the news of (= concerning) the death of Titurius had not yet reached him, nondum ad eum fama de Tituri morte perlata, Caes. B. G. 5, 19: much flattery of (= addressed to) Augusta on the part of the Senate, multa patrum in Augustan adiutio, Tac. A. 1 14: fear of (arising from, caused by) the Emperor, metus ex Imperatore, ib. 11, zo (a constr. not to be imitated). II. In partitive sense: 1. expr. by gen. (after all words which denote a part of a number; including comparatives and superlatives, Zumpi § 429): that at least one of the consuls should be appointed from the commons, ut consulm utique after ex plebe crearetur, Liv. 6, 35, med: so also with uterque: you will greatly oblige both of us, utrque nostrum gratum admodum feceris, Cic. Am. 4, 16 (but in pl., bi utrque, both of these; not horum utrque): thou mightiest of princes, maxime principum! Hor. Od. 4, 14, 6: the elder of (two) young men, major juvenum, id. A. P. 366: Cic. (On (anything) best of all, optime omnium, Cic. Fam. 4, 13, extr. (N.B.—This constr. is not used with words signifying a part of a single whole; in which case an adj. usra occurs in agr. with subs.: e. g. the top, bottom of a tree, summa, ima arbor, etc.: L. G. § 141). 2. expr. by preps. de, ex, and less freq. inter: a few of our men are slain, pauci de nostris cadunt, Caes. B. G. 1, 15: one of them, unus de illis, Cic. Mil. 24, 65: one of the many (the common herd), unus de multis, id. Off. 1, 30, 109 (also, unus e multis, id. Fin. 2, 20, fin.): the keenest of all the senses, acriminus ex omnibus sensibus, id. de Or. 2, 87, 357: one of the soldiers, quidam ex militibus, Caes. B. G. 1, 42: Croesus' richest of kings, ille Croesus opulentissimus inter reges, Sen. Contr.: Mela. N.B.—(1). Instead of either the gen. or a prep., must be used an adj. in agreement with its subs., when the whole are included: e. g. but a few of us survive, nos pauci supervisum, cf. Cic. Ph. 2, 6, 13, venimus ad vivos, qui duo e consulari numero reliqui sunt, i. e. two of whom: so, how many are there of you? quot estis? the prep. of denoting a kind of apposition, not separation. (2). After the dualizing words alter, uter, neuter, uterque, the gen. is preferred; after a superlative, the gen. denotes absolute, unqualified superiority, as a thing beyond doubt: when de or ex is used, the objects compared are placed more on a level. (3). After words not included in the preced., two cases, the use of a prep. is usual in prose, not of a genitive.

III. To denote the material of which a thing is made: 1. ex: esp. after the verb facio: a statue of bronze, statua ex aere facta, Cic. Ver. 2, 21, 50: Varr.: also without facio: cups of gold, pocula ex auro, ib. 4, 27, 62 (but this constr. is less fit for common prose). 2. de (mostly poet.: constr. like preced.): a
